Reach Men, Reach Families

Jason Reeves (July 2026)

The purpose of this article is to propose a ministry strategy for churches in 21st century America. That ministry strategy involves focusing on reaching and discipling men, and prioritizing their spiritual formation with the end goal that they become true shepherds and spiritual leaders within their families. This is not to the exclusion of ministering to women and children within the congregation – rather, behind this proposal is a desire to work within God's established order, to more effectively minister to the entire congregation, but to do so in ways which comport with God's ways.

This order was established at creation, and has been reiterated in many ways throughout the history of God's dealings with His people. Working against this creation order invites discord and disorder. Working within God's prescribed boundaries promises fruitfulness and growth – not only to the men being enabled and equipped to properly lead their families, but also to their wives and their children to whom they have been given the task to minister. The roles of parents in general and fathers in particular are non-transferable roles. Well-meaning churches cannot abrogate Christian parents of their responsibilities before God, and would do well not to step in and "do the job" for the deficient parents in their midst. Rather, the response should be equipping and discipleship of these parents so that they can better carry out their duties. The church may assist, but may not subsume the role of parents.

We will look at the data regarding changing church demographics and influences, state the problems indicated by this data, and then propose solutions based on God's word.

In many ways, the prosperous western church has been on the decline since the beginning of the 20th century. J. Gresham Machen wrote over a century ago about this decline, and his eerily prescient characterization of the problem demonstrates the relevance of his work even today.[1] The church has been battered by all four waves of feminism, by various homosexual movements, transgender insanity, and, most recently, ESG[2], DEI[3], and a weird principle of "safety first" in the face of global "pandemics" that many believed should override the mandate to carry out the public worship of God. Though these most recent ideas definitely took a deeper root in corporate America than in churches, the effects of these philosophies upon the church at large cannot be denied. Churches not scarred by embracing such ideologies (of course, contra scripture), have been battle hardened by having to beat back these worldly philosophies. Some churches have unfortunately *over*corrected, and have been damaged as a result.

One of the ways the culture at large has been reflected in modern churches is in the overall feminization of the church. Many observers have noted that throughout the 20th century, church architecture, design, decor, as well as worship styles and musical choices, have tended more to the feminine than the masculine. Church programming has been engineered to suit feminine tastes. "Soft men", many of whom are not functioning as the family shepherds God has called them to be, have been more and more preferred as elders and pastors. The so-called Eleventh Commandment, "thou shalt be nice", manufactured though it is, has become more important than God's own Decalogue.

Even in churches which have rejected the most flagrant violations indicated by the rebellion of the 20th century: allowing women to preach, embracing the social justice movement, affirming homosexuals in their sin, etc., the pulse and current of the culture can be felt. Men may feel weak or wholly inadequate to shepherd their families. Taking a cue from the culture, they may feel like being assertive and taking authority, even God-ordained authority, is somehow "toxic". Their wives, and I say this to their shame, their very elders, may also work to dampen their enthusiasm to simply shepherd their families as God has commanded. This disorder is the unfortunate result of being discipled by the culture moreso than by God's holy word.

[1] J. Gresham Machen. Christianity and Liberalism. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1923.

[2] Environmental, Social, and Governance

[3] Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion

The Data

Modern western churches overwhelmingly favor a passive version of masculinity, assuming they acknowledge masculinity at all. As a result, we often "check out" of modern church. Men who stay are encouraged in passivity and many don't lead their families well. Men, who are called by God to minister to their wives and to raise children in the faith, are replaced by women's ministries and youth ministries in a vain attempt to fill the gap, but the data shows these efforts do not achieve the intended result, because at the root what's being ignored is God's design for complementarity.

There have been[1] many[2] books[3] written documenting the disengagement of men from modern churches – many more than are referenced in this article. This disengagement of men and the harmful effects upon families is nothing new. If you lived through the 90s/00s or moved in an/a/p, the removal of Paige Patterson from Southwestern in 2018, that horrible Gilette commercial in 2019, the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 during which the competing "Summer of Love" occurred with its "mostly peaceful" protests, and the ensuing ESG and DEI nonsense that swept the US in 2021, you've probably personally seen some of these societal fault lines develop and fracture before your very eyes. You may have thought your own church or denomination was immune. Many, likely, were not. Most churches fell into the category of total capitulation to what they perceived as the new world order, or they experienced – and suffered the ugly, divisive outcomes.[4] Very few churches had a measured, mature response. Of course the period of the late twenty teens to early 2020s did not mark the advent of ideas such as "toxic masculinity" or "intersectionality" – those ideas have been around for quite some time – rather it was the visibility of such certainly made these ideas harder to ignore, and harder to remain silent about. Following is a survey of some observations.

ALL of these books document the following:

1. Churches are healthier when men are engaged.
2. Families are healthier when men are engaged.
3. Marriages are healthier when men are engaged in church.
4. Youth and children are more likely to practice Christianity as adults when their dads are engaged in church.
5. There is a very real gender gap – fathers and men in general have been a real stumbling block in churches for decades.
6. Churches are becoming more and more feminized, creating barriers to male engagement.
7. The church's preoccupation with creating subcultures within the church by way of programs is destructive.

Why Men Hate Going to Church (2005)

David Murrow is a former Presbyterian elder who has some conclusions which I disagree[5] with. However, he's right in that he's identified that the reason many men don't attend church is that the thermostat (figuratively speaking) of most churches has been set to make women and children comfortable, not to mention effete, passive men, with which most men don't want to associate. Murrow goes to great lengths to demonstrate from the data that there has been a steady decline of male participation in the western church for a century at least. This is in spite of the reality that "religious participation" also leads men to become more engaged husbands and fathers. Teens with religious fathers are more likely to "grow up" and they enjoy spending time with their dads and that they admire them. Obviously, men need the church. But does the church need men?[6] Unfortunately the message that many men receive is agree with is, "not really."

Murrow believes that "churches need men because men are natural risk takers."[7] He cites the parable of the talents to demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[8] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[9] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[10] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[11] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[12] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[13] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[14] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[15] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[16] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[17] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[18] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[19] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[20] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[21] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[22] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[23] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[24] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[25] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[26] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[27] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[28] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[29] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[30] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[31] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[32] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[33] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[34] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[35] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[36] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[37] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[38] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[39] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[40] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[41] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[42] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[43] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[44] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[45] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[46] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[47] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[48] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[49] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[50] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[51] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[52] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[53] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[54] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[55] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[56] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[57] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[58] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[59] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[60] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[61] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[62] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[63] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[64] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[65] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[66] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[67] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[68] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[69] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[70] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[71] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[72] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[73] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[74] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[75] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[76] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[77] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[78] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[79] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[80] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[81] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[82] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[83] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[84] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[85] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[86] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[87] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[88] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[89] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[90] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[91] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[92] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[93] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[94] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[95] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[96] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[97] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[98] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[99] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[100] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[101] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[102] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[103] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk tendencies are a trait that critics would say is indicative of "toxic masculinity" – it's just not safe. But is it the case that the kind of churches are supposed to be safe in that way? That the Lord's people are supposed to be soft – or do we not serve a God who calls us to die?

Murrow points out how liberal churches have faced steep declines in recent decades, and the decline usually starts with the men leaving. He writes, 'self-described liberal churches were a parent movement that in a few generations gave the conservative ones"[104] by which he means that there were significantly more women in such churches than men.

Churches that value stability and security over obedience, which are risk averse, which make decisions and resolve conflict the same[105] way that "a board of directors of a business" does, demonstrate that Christianity is a religion that must be comfortable taking risks. Note what the position of the 'wicked and lazy' servant in the parable was. However, men's risk t

The Problem

Churches err when they try to circumvent God's covenant order as well as violate the concept of sphere sovereignty. The Bible teaches male headship. Although men and women are of equal worth before God, they have different callings based upon immutable biological and spiritual characteristics.[44] The role God has chosen for men is that of the head, or leader within families, churches, and indeed civilization itself. We have to work within the frameworks God has provided for us, or else we risk distorting God's truth, not to mention doing harm to ourselves and others.

[44] This biblical way of understanding gender roles and differences is called complementarianism, meaning to indicate that men and women were created to complement each other, each making up for the inherent deficiencies in the other. Throughout this discussion, I'll be using gender and sex as synonyms recognizing immutable biological and spiritual characteristics, not social constructs. The notion that one's God-given gender is merely a "social construct" is anathema.

The Solution

Churches should focus on and prioritize ministry to men in order to build strong families and strong churches. Reaching men reaches everyone. By working along with God's design, we will be able to do His work more effectively. It's already hard enough to do God's work in this world, but we make it harder when we "kick against the pricks".